“This is a fascinating analysis of IHL training, as it is and as it should be. The author’s extensive personal experience, and the lessons he draws from numerous empirical studies, combine to make this a powerful and original contribution to the scholarship in this field. It is essential reading for anyone interested in the promotion of IHL.” — Alison Pert, Adjunct Associate Professor, The University of Sydney Law School, Australia

“The contribution is unique in its approach and data. This book has the potential to improve training and readiness of US forces prior to overseas deployments to conflict zones where IHL presents as a repeated concern.” —Dr. Ryan Burke, Associate Professor, United States Air Force Academy, US

The book charts the use of empirical assessment over the last 20 years to make IHL training more effective and links it with recent research that emphasizes the role of military leaders in building a values-oriented culture of IHL compliance with their soldiers.
