Studies the concept of refuge as well as historical forced displacement and statelessness, and attempts to provide potential lasting solutions to the many problems associated with this situation.

Readership

General public as well as humanities students and scholars interested in the topics of refuge, refugees, forced displacement, asylum seekers, and climate change.

Key selling points

- Adding humanities research to a crucial issue in today's world, each of the essays in the book responds to a different question related to refuge, refugees, and refugeehood: by what routes can humanities thinkers lead diverse scholars and publics into uncertain futures through explorations of the topics of refuge and refugees?
- Call for humanities scholars to craft new stories of power and values, to pursue alternate mappings of a multiplicity of views, and to foster not only creative re-imaginings but also ultimately new realizations, of a more just and compassionate future that considers solutions to today's refugee crisis.
